Quarterly Fund Manager Review

The Fund generated a positive return over the quarter. The quarter started with a continuation of the sell-off in global bond markets over October, which negatively impacted broader asset markets. Expectations that we had reached the 'peak rate plateau' gained traction in November, driven by better inflation data and softer US jobs data. This proved a highly supportive environment for most asset classes. We edged our equity and dividend futures positions higher, seeking to benefit from further gains into year end, and removed the interest rates hedges on our infrastructure holdings. December saw markets bring forward their expectations for the first US interest rate cut to March, and price in a rapid easing cycle thereafter. Falling rate expectations buoyed returns across equity, bond and credit markets. Our equity holdings were the largest contributor to returns, driven by an impressive rally in the US. Dividend futures exposures also performed well. In fixed income, government bond yields declined, and credit spreads tightened, which proved especially beneficial to investment grade credit, high yield and emerging market debt. Our defensive strategies suffered in this environment, and our commodity exposures generated a small negative return. We expect the soft-landing/mid-cycle slowdown narrative to hold and with it the potential for further stock market gains. We therefore edged up equity exposure to just above our longer-term average, increased exposure to dividend futures and high yield credit, and reduced the extent of some defensive strategies. Mindful, however, that a further lurch up in rates could trigger a larger bout of equity market turbulence, we continued to build option-based positions that improve portfolio diversification and took profits on other option positions that had captured upside in US and European equities. We maintained our investment grade credit and emerging market debt exposures, and with equities and government bonds still positively correlated we held duration levels constant. Finally, we have been active in managing currency trades across a broad range of currencies via options when market pricing has become attractive.
