Quarterly manager commentary

Market Update

After a volatile 2022, markets staged a significant recovery in 2023 buoyed by cooling inflation and an easing of Federal Reserve policy. The US economy showed particular resilience with technology stocks rebounding strongly - the Nasdaq index rose over 50% led by the mega-cap "Magnificent 7" tech giants. Eurozone markets also displayed renewed optimism, though Asian equities declined notably in China and Hong Kong.

In Australia, materials and financials drove a solid return despite global economic challenges. The year saw large-cap stocks outperform smaller counterparts amidst polarized volatility. Fixed income returns diverged between robust global fixed interest and lagging Australian fixed interest. Sentiment began turning more positive in October, with a strong November rally in growth stocks. December saw markets continue their upward trajectory to end the year on a high note, though some pullbacks occurred.

While the rebound seemed robust, some speculate it was driven more by credit conditions and market liquidity rather than economic fundamentals. This raises questions regarding stability risks from potential overtightening and market dependency on accommodative Fed policy.

Portfolio Update

Throughout the quarter, the portfolio witnessed fluctuations in its performance, with different asset classes alternating in their roles as top and bottom performers. Initially marked by a downturn, the portfolio later rebounded, reflecting the inherent volatility and unpredictability of the market. Notably, Alternatives, which started as the strongest asset class, transitioned into the weakest by the end of the quarter. In contrast, Property & Infrastructure consistently emerged as a robust performer, highlighting the sector's resilience during this period.

Asset allocation played a pivotal role in shaping the portfolio's performance throughout the quarter. The strategic distribution of investments across various asset classes, including top-performing assets such as the Macquarie True Index Listed Property Fund and less successful ones like the Global X Physical Gold, highlighted the intricacies of portfolio management. This variance in performance underscored the importance of a nuanced approach to selecting and balancing different asset classes. Initially, an overweight position in Alternatives proved advantageous, but as the quarter progressed, this strategy presented challenges, illustrating the need for a dynamic and responsive approach to asset allocation in order to adapt to changing market conditions.

The international equities component of the portfolio also played a significant role. After a challenging start, this segment rebounded, contributing positively to the overall portfolio return. The performance of funds in global growth and smaller companies sectors was particularly noteworthy, demonstrating the potential benefits of geographical and sectoral diversification.

In summary, the quarter was characterized by a series of contrasts and shifts. The change in the leading and lagging asset classes over the three months highlighted the fluid nature of the market. The period underscored the importance of adaptive asset allocation, vigilant security selection, and the benefits of diversification across sectors and geographies. These dynamics collectively shaped the portfolio's performance, offering valuable insights into the complexities of managing an investment portfolio in a fluctuating market environment.

Market Outlook

Heading into 2024, cautious optimism could continue if the soft landing scenario persists, with inflation remaining muted and allowing further Fed easing. Key indicators to monitor include steady job growth without triggering price increases, stabilized housing, resilient corporate earnings and consumer discretionary spending.

Upside factors include China's reopening and no worsening of geopolitical tensions like the Ukraine conflict. However, risks linger from lingering supply chain disruptions, resurgent inflation if demand suddenly surges, and high debt levels threatening solvency if rates spike again. Markets may continue exhibiting periodic volatility and pullbacks, especially if liquidity tightens. But expectations lean toward ongoing stable growth rather than severe recession.

If the Goldilocks environment endures, equities and bonds could grind higher with tech and cyclicals preferred over defensive stocks. Still, achieving sustained growth remains tricky given structural vulnerabilities like debt and globalization's weaknesses. Policy missteps also pose ever-present risks.
